Focial Troglodytes. (From the Saturday Review.)

some ancient writers have left us accounts of curious race of neorle to whom they gave the name of Troglodytes. These strange beings had no houses, but lived in holes which they dug in the ground. They had no words with which to express such ideas as they may have passessed. but resorted to uncouth and inarticulate sounds. At the sight of a stranger they escaped swiftly into their holes, while even with one another they held but little intercourse. Various other particulars are recorded of their habits, all forming a most astonishing picture of what human nature oan come to, or rather, perhaps, of what it could ascand from. Yet, after all, the lowest states, of civilization at different epochs are, as a role winderfully like one another. Circumstances change and external conditions after, but an ingenious inquirer has no difficulty in tracing a substantial recemblance at bottom between the barburaneness of different periods, and even the most polished are is sure to contain a class of people, in a stage comparative barbarism. If would not be in any way surprising, therefore, if we should find that, after the lapse of so many hundreds of years. there are still those among us whom it is impossible not to recognise as the representatives of the ancient troglodytes. This, indeed, proves to bu the case. The troglodyte is still among us, and we may still porder with as much interest as was Office or Store, Address, A.B.C., Office of this felt by the old geographers, the habits and mun.
